MISCELLANEOUS READING.

With its soft and beaming light, But my heart, my heart, is aching, With its dark and bitter strife. Still, still, the soul keeps yearning, With the hope it may be blest,

All life to love is turning, To the home within my breast. The twilight steals upon me, Nought breaks the spirit's chain, No hand shall steal it from me,

Till thine press near again: Then will I listen to thee. With a fond attentive ear, When from thy eyelid on my cheek, Again shall fall the tear. I know not why I love so much,

Nor whence the soul is stirred, The pulse of joy, that sweeps so wild In every whispered word-I care not how the world may strive, To tear thee from my breast, I only feel to me thou art, The dearest and the best.

I look not for approving smiles, Or worship from the crowd, For treachery's praise, or flattery's wiles, The homage of the proud; I only ask a smile from thee, A place within thine heart,

And all the rest shall then for me, Smile, glance, and swift depart! E. E. R. COMMUNICATED.

Oh! there are vows so lightly made, Which breathe and break forever; And there are words that never fade, But bring back tones still ever; But there are eyes, whose glance tho' bright,

Beam on us once and fade away, vows.

And there are those whose gentle light, Within our hearts knows no decay! E. E. R. RAPTUROUS. A London letter-writer says there is in that city "a young lady from Baltimore, who is the most beautiful woman in the British dominions. She is the dream of the poet-the beau-ideal of the painter, the unequalled, beavenly mould of the inspired sculptor. Her eyes reflect both heaven and earth and are more brilliant than either." The fellow must be in "luv."
